'From Little Acorns Part 1'

A few word from our speaker.

This will be my first talk that I have ever given, I am both nervous and also excited about giving the talk.

I started researching my family in 1975, after the death of my father on the 10 November 1974. I was 19.

My paternal grandparents died years before I was born, my maternal grandma and my mum died in 1962 within a few months of each other, and my maternal granddad died in 1967.

I realised after my dad died, I knew very little about my family.

Until a few years prior to dad's death, I thought he had 3 sisters and 1 brother. Little did I realise, the Auntie Doris and Auntie Irene that were mentioned in conversation occasionally. Were in fact my dad's sisters, of whom he never spoke.

My talk on the 7 March, is about my Great Granddad and when I started researching in 1975, I only wanted to know his name. As a child, I had been given a snippet of information about him, just 15 words, and since 1994 I set out to prove or disprove this information. Now the amount I know about him is beyond belief, never in my wildest dreams, did I think I would find so much about this man.

His name was John Taylor and he was a policeman. So not an easy name to research.

The more I have found the more interesting it gets. It has been a fascinating journey, as I have delved into the life of this 19th century policeman and his family, for instance his children were orphaned less than 2 years after his death.

As of now the beginning of 2017 my research is far from complete and I am looking forward to further research and hoping that this will then form, 'From Little Acorns Part 2'.

John Taylor died in 1886, so some documents maybe still locked, particularly information for some people as these documents have not reached the 100-year mark.

I hope you will find time to join me on the 7 March, and hope you find it as fascinating as I have found it.

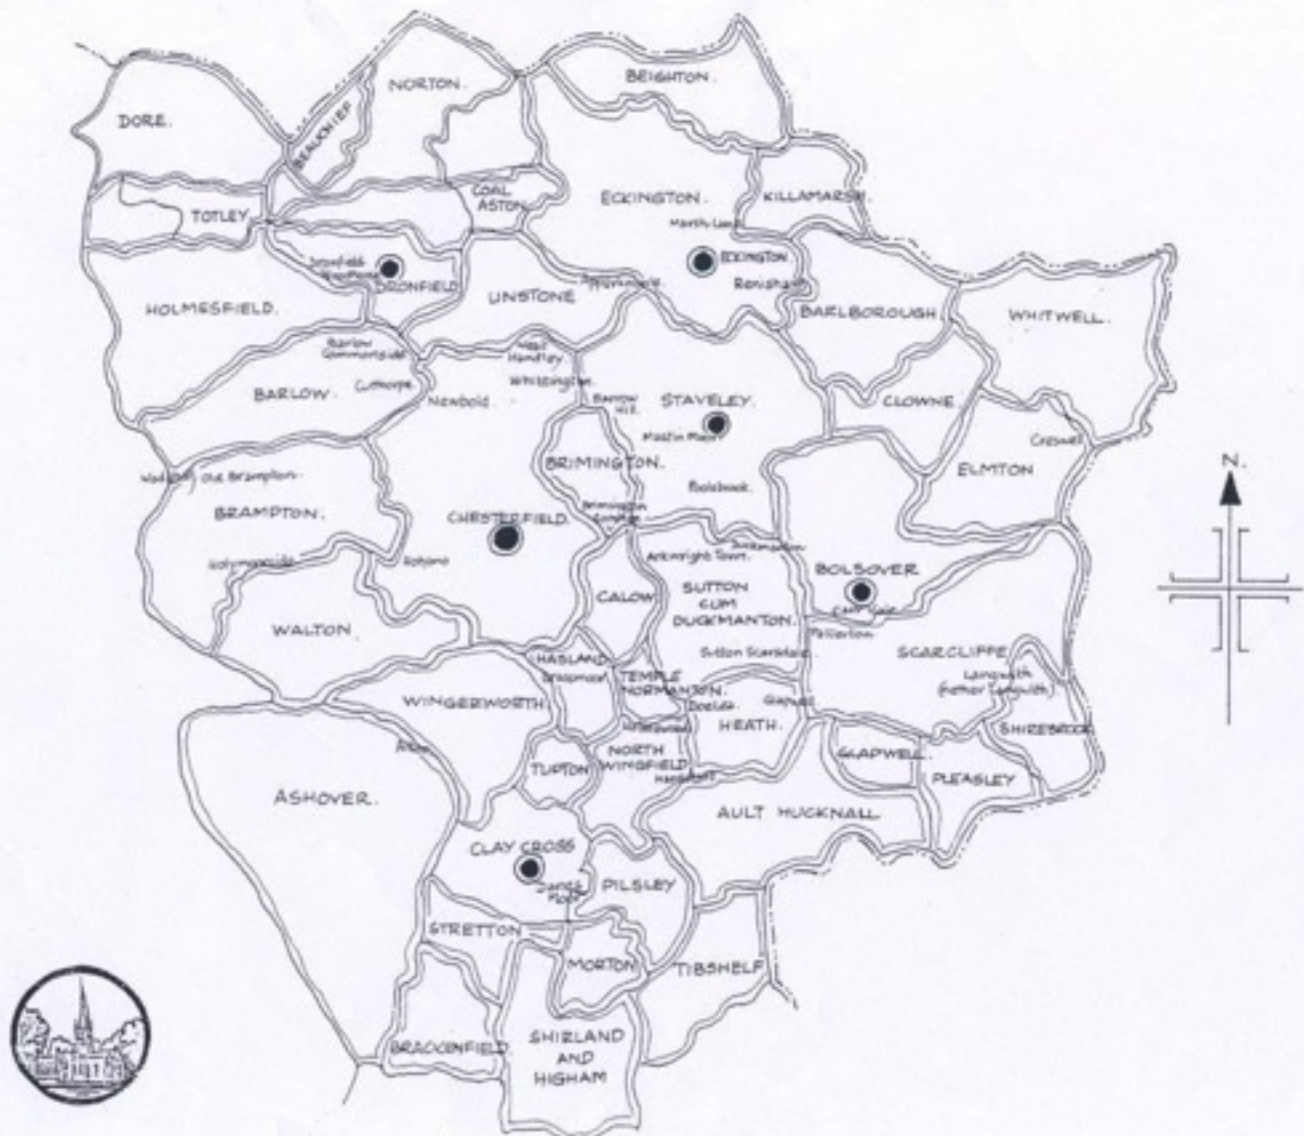

I don't want to give too much away, otherwise it would spoil the surprise.

Lynne Earland

Non Conformity and Dissenters

7th February 2017

Religious non-conformity in England

In the 16th century, Henry VIII of England broke from the Catholic church to establish the Church of England, also known as the Anglican church. The motives for this action can be debated. Many believe that it was based solely on his desire to have his marriage annulled so that could marry another woman who he believed could give him an heir to the throne. Some believe it was an act of religious faith. In any case, the new church (also called the Established Church) was not universally welcomed and quickly became politicized. Rejection of the Established Church became seen as a rejection of the Crown. Many who dared to challenge the Established Church were interested in remaining loyal to the Catholic Church headquartered in Rome. They became known as Roman Catholics. There were others who agreed with a separation from Rome, but had other ideas about the form such a "protest" should take. They were part of a larger Protestant movement sweeping through Europe around this time. However, in England, these ideas were seen as political protest, not just religious protest. For this reason, English protestants are often referred to as Dissenters or Non-conformists.

Throughout the late 1500s, many Roman Catholic and Non-conformist leaders were burned at the stake (some after death; others while still alive). Throughout most of the 1600s, Sunday attendance in the Established (Anglican) church was mandatory for all and those not attending could be fined and punished. Although the "Act of Toleration" introduced a degree of religious freedom in 1689, many still kept their association with non-conformist movements a secret, often being baptized in both the Protestant and the Anglican churches.

As the years passed, association with a Non-conformist church (such as Baptist, Presbyterian, or Methodist) became more accepted. Hardwicke's Marriage Act (1753) required marriage in an Anglican church, so that a non-conformist ancestor may show a baptism in a non-conformist church and a marriage in an establish parish belonging to the Church of England - suggesting (erroneously) a conversion. It wasn't until 1837 that a couple could be legally married in a non-Anglican parish church.
